

THE AMERICAN
OCCUPATIONAL THERAPY
FOUNDATION

Statement on Research and the Public Interest

The American Occupational Therapy Foundation is committed to the highest principles of objectivity and neutrality in the conduct of its activities and programs. Accordingly, its policies and practices strive to encourage accuracy, the consideration of all available information in conclusions, and the avoidance of any form of prejudice or bias that would compromise the validity or reliability of outcomes or conclusions. The foundation relies on the wider community of scientists and scholars to apply the rules of evidence and guidelines for objectivity particular to research in occupational therapy and occupational science. As a charitable and tax-exempt non-profit organization, AOTF does not and cannot specifically endorse nor advocate for particular findings, scientists, schools of thought, scientific programs or individual studies. Publications, support, and the recognition of groups, individuals, or their work is based on peer recommendations and should not be interpreted as representing AOTF's official endorsement. The Foundation believes that it can best achieve its purposes by remaining transparent and neutral; steadfastly avoiding any perception that it selectively supports or reports findings or conclusions that would be used to advocate for particular professional claims, points of view, or public policy.
